From city flat to beehives

Lily Carter is nineteen and studies biology in Manchester. In her free time she looks after three beehives on the roof of the building where she lives. We asked her about her unusual hobby.

1 .....

My grandfather kept bees in his garden, and I used to help him every summer. When I moved to the city, I missed it so much that I asked the owner of our building if I could put a hive on the roof. To my surprise, he said yes.

2 .....

Not at all. People think city bees are hungry, but there are lots of flowers in parks, gardens and even on balconies. In fact, my bees often produce more honey than my grandfather's did in the countryside.

3 .....

Only twice, and both times it was my own fault. I was in a hurry and didn't wear my gloves. Bees are quite calm if you move slowly and don't panic.

4 .....

In a good year, about twenty kilos. I keep some for myself and my friends, and I sell the rest at a small market on Saturday mornings. The money pays for new equipment.

5 .....

At first they were worried, especially the family with small children on the top floor. So I invited everyone to the roof, showed them the hives and gave them a jar of honey. Now they often ask me how the bees are doing.

6 .....

I'd like to start a beekeeping club at the university. Lots of students have asked me about it, and I think it would be a great way to teach people why bees are so important.

Don't throw it away – fix it!

Every second Saturday of the month, the community hall in the small town of Ashford fills with broken things: toasters, lamps, bicycles, torn jackets and even an old radio from the 1960s. This is the Ashford Repair Café, where volunteers help visitors fix their things for free.

The café was started four years ago by Margaret Hill, a retired science teacher. 'I was shocked when my neighbour threw away a vacuum cleaner just because a small part was broken,' she explains. 'I fixed it in ten minutes. Then I thought: there must be lots of people who would repair their things if someone showed them how.'

Today the café has about twenty volunteers. Some are electricians or tailors, others are simply good with their hands. The most popular volunteer is sixteen-year-old Sam, who can repair almost any mobile phone. 'Young people often think repairing is old-fashioned,' he says, 'but it's actually like solving a puzzle.'

Visitors do not pay for the repairs, but there is a box for donations next to the tea table. The money is used to buy tools and spare parts. The only rule is that visitors must stay and help with the repair. 'We don't want to be a free repair shop,' says Margaret. 'We want people to learn.'

Last year the volunteers repaired more than six hundred items, and the town council says that the amount of rubbish has noticeably decreased. Several other towns in the area have now asked Margaret for advice on starting their own repair cafés.
